Sarah Walker with a rousing musical mix

Sarah Walker chooses three hours of attractive and uplifting music to complement your morning.

Today, Sarah chooses two pieces which show the sunniest side of the key of D major: Jean-Marie Leclair's Violin Concerto No.2 with its shining instrumentation and Marc-Antoine Charpentier's gloriously bombastic Te Deum.

She also finds a track full of winding melodies played by Northumbrian pipes player Kathryn Tickle and her band, and discovers glorious syncopation in a little-known Norwegian Overture.

Plus, a classic jazz number that was fortunately rescued from a bin!

Masters of the Queen's Music

As part of the Platinum Jubilee celebrations, Hannah French explores the history of the role of the Master of the Queen's Music, which dates back to Charles I's appointment of Nicholas Lanier in 1625.

The job itself has changed a great deal in those four hundred years, as we'll hear from the current incumbent - Judith Weir - the first woman to hold the position.

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896)

The Eternal Student

This week Donald Macleod lifts the lid on the life and music of Anton Bruckner, focusing upon different themes to better understand both the man and the music. Today, he journeys through Bruckner's chequered career as a teacher.

Anton Bruckner was one of the great symphonists, and yet recognition for his talents as a composer came late in life. An Austrian by birth, noted for his improvisatory skills at the organ, he received invitations to travel abroad to France and England to demonstrate his skills. But though he would eventually be recognised as one of the most innovative composers of the late 19th century, during his lifetime he was plagued by doubt, not helped by the harsh reactions of Viennese music critics. He was also often dubbed a buffoon because of his dress, dialect and mannerisms.

From a very young age, Anton Bruckner demonstrated his keenness to learn. He loved sitting next to his father on the organ bench, and by the age of ten he was able to deputise for his father at the instrument. Also like his father, Bruckner initially embarked on a career as a teacher. But his first post as an assistant teacher was a period of drudgery, at the hands of a senior master who didn't appreciate music and often sent young Bruckner off into the fields to shovel manure. Soon however other opportunities came his way, so that over the trajectory of his career, we see him not only teaching privately, but holding posts at the Vienna Conservatoire and University. And Bruckner himself maintained a passion for learning, seeking out tutors who would help him develop further as a composer, even if they were much younger than himself.

Writers on Music

Kate Molleson talks to some of today's greatest writers about how music shapes their work and explores the ineffable intersection between words and music. Featuring Colm Tóibín, Elif Shafak, Ishmael Reed, Simon Armitage and Lavinia Greenlaw.

Best-selling Irish author Colm Tóibín's writing is infused with sound and music. His latest book is a fictional account of the life of Thomas Mann and is steeped in Mahler and Schoenberg. He discusses the powerful role music plays in his fiction and reads from his book 'Nora Webster', in which the main character finds resilience through music after the death of her husband. Turkish-British writer Elif Shafak talks about the sound of Istanbul, the social implications of sound and silence and how her books can give voice to those in society who are otherwise voiceless. She reads from her acclaimed book '10 Minutes 38 Seconds in this Strange World' and talks about the influence of heavy metal on her writing. US writer Ishmael Reed explores the role of improvisation and rhythm in his work, including his 1972 classic 'Mumbo Jumbo' and a new collection of poetry called 'Why the Black Hole Sings the Blues'. Poet Laureate Simon Armitage discusses how music and words mix in the poetry he writes for his band LYR and the volatility of language when set to music. And poet and novelist Lavinia Greenlaw explores the fundamental way in which music has shaped her writing throughout her life, as well as the interconnectedness of music, memory and emotion.

MON 22:45 The Essay (m001bsbm)

Sign Language Is My Language

Sign Language through the Ages (Robert Adam)

Dr Robert Adam is an assistant professor at Heriot-Watt University and a lecturer in Linguistics, British Sign Language and Deaf Studies.

In his essay, 'Sign Language through the Ages', Robert explores the rich and layered history of British Sign Language. He recalls the first time he read a piece of deaf history - his father's school published 'Utmost for the Highest' for its centenary in 1962, and was full of black and white photos of stern looking people and impressive edifices. The faces and names of long-dead deaf people leapt out at Robert and made him wonder what was life like for those deaf people then? They achieved so much but would have had to find their way in times where there were no anti-discrimination laws.

Robert shares with us how Deaf people and sign languages have existed since antiquity. Quintus Pedius, a painter in the first century AD, is the first recorded deaf person in history. The first clear record of sign language being used was a wedding in Leicester in 1575.

So why is sign language still viewed as a 'new' language by some? Robert shares the story of the fated Milan Congress held in September 1880 which was attended by mostly hearing educators from around the world who resolved to stop the use of sign language in the classroom. After Milan, sign language went 'underground' till the 20th century where it began to gain traction again - largely due to programmes such as 'Vision On' and 'See Hear' which graced our screens.

Within the context of the historical discourse, Robert concludes that deaf people are pioneers in their field and their work has had an impact on our lives today.

TUE 12:00 Composer of the Week (m001bs90)

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896)

Organist Extraordinaire

Donald Macleod follows Bruckner's ascent into the organ lofts of Europe.

Anton Bruckner was one of the great symphonists, and yet recognition for his talents as a composer came late in life. An Austrian by birth, noted for his improvisatory skills at the organ, he received invitations to travel abroad to France and England to demonstrate his skills. But though he would eventually be recognised as one of the most innovative composers of the late 19th century, during his lifetime he was plagued by doubt, not helped by the harsh reactions of Viennese music critics. He was also often dubbed a buffoon because of his dress, dialect and mannerisms. This week Donald Macleod lifts the lid on the life and music of Anton Bruckner, focusing upon different themes to better understand both the man and the music.

Bruckner's interest in the organ developed from a very young age, watching his father play for their local church. By the age of ten, he was deputising for his father and after being accepted as a chorister at St. Florian monastery, would go on to establish his reputation as a virtuoso performer and improviser on the organ in the monastery church there. Despite his talents, Bruckner was often shy when it came to putting himself forward. At an interview for the post of organist at Linz Cathedral, his own teacher had to chivvy him along to attend. But once the panel heard him play, there was no question that he was the right person for the job.

Throughout his career, his reputation as an improviser at the organ often over-shadowed his reputation as a composer. He received an invitation to perform on the organ of Notre Dame in Paris, where distinguished guests such as Saint-Saëns and Gounod were greatly impressed. Then in the 1870s he was invited to give six recitals in London at the Royal Albert Hall, where he held the audience so spell-bound on the Father Willis organ, that he was asked to give further concerts at the Crystal Palace. But despite Bruckner's great success at the organ, we're left asking why, as a composer, he left so few compositions for this instrument.

What language did Columbus speak?

Christopher Columbus spoke to lots of people: his family and kin in Genova, merchants in Venice, royalty in Madrid, the crew of his ship, not to mention the people he met on the other side of the Atlantic. Today, we would consider this a case of multilingualism. But is that how Columbus would have seen it? What language did he think he spoke himself? In the same period a pidgin language developed to allow linguistically diverse communities in the eastern Mediterranean and north Africa to carry out trade, diplomacy, and general communication. We look at the latest research on this language, known as lingua franca, and consider what it might tell us about communication amongst the linguistic communities of the same region today. New Generation Thinker John Gallagher is joined by guests Dr Joanna Nolan, Professor Nandini Das, Dr Birgül Yılmaz, and translator David Bellos.

Producer: Luke Mulhall

Dr Joanna Nolan teaches at SOAS, University of London and is the author of The Elusive Case of Lingua Franca: Fact and Fiction

Sign Language Is My Language

Tina Kelberman

Tina Kelberman shares her experience of growing up in a large deaf Jewish family. Her family has inherited deafness for six generations now and are probably also the biggest Deaf Jewish family in the UK. Whilst their culture is steeped in history, spanning back almost two centuries, it's been a rocky road for them - as Tina shares. She hated the feeling of people watching her family communicate in sign language. Her parents also hated it and so did her grandparents- to the point where their signs were smaller and more secretive when out in public. 70 years on, not much has changed. But Tina talks of how we are bolder these days, and how her own children stare right back until the people staring look away.

Tina talks candidly about how sign language is like any other language and so it evolves. Tina gives us examples of the evolution such as the telephone - how signs evolved from the candlestick phone to the mobile phone as we know it today. Tina used to correct her mother's signing, just like all kids groan at their parents' seemingly outdated or uncool words.

With her children being two of the last deaf, Jewish people from a large deaf family, she worries about what the future holds for them. Tina admits that her children don't know the Jewish signs for Hanukkah and Passover, or understand why these words are signed as they are. She wonders if it is maybe it is time for her to take them to the Jewish Deaf Association to remind them of their heritage and to use signs that have been passed on to them.

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896)

Adoration of Wagner

Donald Macleod journeys through the developing relationship between Bruckner and Richard Wagner.

Anton Bruckner was one of the great symphonists, and yet recognition for his talents as a composer came late in life. An Austrian by birth, noted for his improvisatory skills at the organ, he received invitations to travel abroad to France and England to demonstrate his skills. But though he would eventually be recognised as one of the most innovative composers of the late 19th century, during his lifetime he was plagued by doubt, not helped by the harsh reactions of Viennese music critics. He was also often dubbed a buffoon because of his dress, dialect and mannerisms. This week Donald Macleod lifts the lid on the life and music of Anton Bruckner, focusing upon different themes to better understand both the man and the music.

It was Otto Kitzler who first introduced Bruckner to the music of Richard Wagner and, from that point, Bruckner was a devotee. This encounter had a huge impact upon Bruckner's own compositions, which took on a new lease of life.

Bruckner would go on to meet Richard Wagner a number of times, and would even kiss his hand and call him Master. He visited Munich for the premiere of Tristan and Isolde, and also travelled to Bayreuth where he showed Wagner two of his symphonies. His third symphony was dedicated to Wagner and included references to several of his operas. But not everyone in Vienna was a fan of Wagner and there was a deep divide between those who followed Wagner and those who championed Brahms - a division which created much public hostility towards the adoring Bruckner.

Edinburgh International Festival 2022 (2/4)

The Bergen Philharmonic Orchestra and Chief Conductor Edward Gardner conjure the spirit of the dance in works by Ravel and Rachmaninov and reveal the passionate emotions of Schumann with Icelandic pianist, Víkingur Ólafsson.

Ravel's La Valse conveys a very clear image. In his score Ravel described an immense hall hung with chandeliers, waltzing couples and whirling crowds. Víkingur Ólafsson makes his Edinburgh International Festival debut in Schumann's long awaited, and only, piano concerto which he composed for his wife Clara, who premiered it in Dresden in 1845. Edward Gardner and the Bergen Philharmonic Orchestra conclude their performance with Rachmaninov's Hollywood-style Symphonic Dances. The original inspiration was a 1915 ballet called 'The Scythians' but it took another 30 years before those early sketches became his Symphonic Dances and ultimately his final full orchestral work.

Sign Language Is My Language

Deepa Shastri

Deepa Shastri, an actress, sign song performer and British Sign Language consultant.

Deepa explores how Deaf culture and sign language being represented in the arts is so important to the deaf community but also how the arts and sign language naturally go hand in hand - due to the visual and expressive nature of sign language. Back in the 80s, when Marlee Matlin became the first deaf Oscar winner for her performance in 'Children of a Lesser God', things were about to become very exciting for the deaf arts.

Fast forward a few decades, Deepa shares how we are now entering a new era where deaf people are being represented on screen and on stage with the likes of Rose Ayling-Ellis picking up the Glitterball, Sophie Stone appearing in Dr. Who and Nadeem Islam making waves on series such as ITV's 'The Bay'. Theatre companies such as Deafinitely Theatre were and continue to be the breeding ground of deaf talent.

Within the context of exploring Deafinitely Theatre's work, Deepa explores the complex process of translating Shakespeare plays to British Sign Language and how BSL has its limitations; we do not have signs for every word that exists in the English Dictionary which makes translation difficult. Still, the positives outweigh the limitations. Sign language is very poetic which bodes well for Shakespeare plays in sign language.

Deepa concludes that she believes we're entering the golden age for deaf performers as sign language and deaf performers are appearing on all platforms to show the beauty of sign language and how it elevate a performance or a production.

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896)

Hostility in the Press

Donald Macleod follows the relationship from friend to bitter foe between Bruckner and Hanslick

Anton Bruckner was one of the great symphonists, and yet recognition for his talents as a composer came late in life. An Austrian by birth, noted for his improvisatory skills at the organ, he received invitations to travel abroad to France and England to demonstrate his skills. But though he would eventually be mannerisms. This week Donald Macleod lifts the lid on the life and music of Anton Bruckner, focusing upon different themes to Eduard Hanslick was one of the most influential music critics in Vienna in his day, with the power to annihilate a person's reputation. Bruckner first met Hanslick in the 1860s, and their relationship was initially full of friendly advice and encouragement. The critic was very receptive to Bruckner's works, including his Symphony No 1, and his Mass in F minor.

However, this supportive tone from Hanslick was not to last, and with the premiere of the composer's Symphony No 2 came the first signs that the relationship had cooled.

Hanslick's main objection was Bruckner's devotion to Wagner, an influence that could clearly be heard in his music. Fuelled by his dislike of any taint of Wagnerism, Hanslick did his best to stop Bruckner from being appointed to a teaching post at the Vienna University, and his comments in the press - characterising Bruckner's music as hopelessly disjointed, unnatural, pretentious, morbid - were designed to turn people and other music critics against the composer. But despite Hanslick's best efforts, Bruckner's music became all the rage, and the critic's vitriol was a lone voice.

To live forever

Karel Čapek's 1922 play about a famous singer who has lived for over 300 years was adapted into an opera by the composer Leoš Janáček and premiered in 1926. George Bernard Shaw's play Back to Methuselah premiered in 1922 also looks at human destiny and ideas about long life. As Welsh National Opera's new touring production of The Makropulos Affair by Janáček opens in Cardiff, Matthew Sweet and guests, including New Generation Thinker Prof Sarah Dillon, explore the quest for endless youth in literature, film and myth and discussions of the idea by philosophers including Bernard Williams.

The Makropulos Affair opens at the Wales Millennium Centre, Cardiff on Friday 16th September for three performances and then goes on tour to Llandudno, Plymouth, Birmingham, Southampton and Oxford.

Professor Sarah Dillon is working on a student guide How to Study the Contemporary and researching a literary history of AI. Her books include Storylistening: Narrative Evidence and Public Reasoning and she is on the editorial boards of C21: Journal of Twenty-First Century Writing and Fantastika.

THU 22:45 The Essay (m001bsdw)

Sign Language Is My Language

Robert Adam

Dr Robert Adam is an assistant professor at Heriot-Watt University and a lecturer in Linguistics, British Sign Language and Deaf Studies.

In the course of his essay, Robert asks, who are the arbiters of British Sign Language? How can its evolution be managed?

Robert shares how fewer deaf children are learning British Sign Language at school, and more are now learning it later in life, as young adults. From an outsider's perspective this may seem relatively harmless, but this language deprivation and dispersal of deaf people from each other, means that deaf children do not get the chance to develop extensive peer groups, or learn to sign from a fluent or native signer.

Robert goes on to explore the colonial history of British Sign Language and how there is no single country that 'owns' the one language, and British Sign Language is certainly not owned solely by the British Deaf community. He talks wryly of the irony of deaf people in the UK continuing to struggle with equal access to information and participation in broader society and yet BSL is a colonising language.

Robert talks frankly of how on various platforms we are now witnessing astonishing bastardisations of sign language, to the point that a BSL Watchdog has recently been established by a group of concerned deaf people. There are also concerns about sign language gradually being eroded as new generations of deaf children are denied access to it through what Robert sees as misguided attempts at so-called "inclusion" in education. Will so-called, 'proper sign language' become a thing of the past?

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896)

Afflictions and Obsessions

Donald Macleod explores the effect on Bruckner's music of the composer's ill health.

Anton Bruckner was one of the great symphonists, and yet recognition for his talents as a composer came late in life. An Austrian by birth, noted for his improvisatory skills at the organ, he received invitations to travel abroad to France and England to demonstrate his skills. But though he would eventually be recognised as one of the most innovative composers of the late 19th century, during his lifetime he was plagued by doubt. This week Donald Macleod lifts the lid on the life and music of Anton Bruckner, focusing upon different themes to better understand both the man and the music.

Bruckner was a sensitive person, who found it hard to take the criticism of the Viennese music press. And his clothes, dialect and mannerisms made the composer an object of ridicule in the city. He suffered from loneliness and depression and was admitted for treatment to a sanatorium at Bad Kreuzen. Bruckner had had a complete breakdown. But it wasn't the cures of baths and sour cold milk which picked him up again, but his work on Mass No 3.

Bruckner's final symphony, Symphony No 9, would also be distinctly influenced by his ongoing health issues, composed when he was diagnosed with a heart condition and progressive liver failure. Bruckner poured all his energy into writing this symphony, and the Scherzo is the most terrifying of all his Scherzos - taking the listener to the edge of an abyss.

1913 is the significant year for the two musical works in tonight's performance by Les Siècles and François-Xavier Roth. 1913 was the year that Stravinsky's Rite of Spring was heard in its original scoring at the riot-inducing premiere in Paris. Stravinsky's inspiration for the work came from a vision he'd had of a young girl dancing herself to death for a Pagan ritual. 1913 was also the year that Lili Boulanger became the first woman to win the prestigious Prix de Rome, for her Cantata Faust et Helene. At just 19 years old, Boulanger won the coveted prize with this work showcasing her incredible composing talent and imagination, her mastery of orchestration and richly coloured harmonies whilst still a teenager. Recorded at the Usher Hall in Edinburgh and presented by Kate Molleson.

Sign Language Is My Language

Christopher Laing

For the final essay in the series, architectural designer Christopher Laing gives a personal account of how he started Signstrokes, which introduces standardised sign language for architecture. Deaf people are not new to architecture, however they face significant barriers because the sign language vocabulary of the profession is not standardised and lacks terms to express architectural concepts uncommon in everyday language.

Christopher, drawing upon his own difficult experience at university, where he suffered the consequence of few deaf people before him studying architecture anywhere. The knock-on effect was that very few British Sign Language interpreters knew architectural terms or context, having never worked in the field before. Christopher had to take on the additional responsibility, on top of his degree, of helping the university interpreters familiarise themselves with the jargon and signs to use when interpreting the lectures.

Christopher collaborated with Adolfs Kristapsons to create the corpus dictionary of architect signs that everyone could use. Christopher shares with us the long, laborious process of creating new signs. Christopher asserts that not only are these signs useful for the deaf community - but actually seeing what words mean, helps everyone understand each other. Christopher hopes that Signstrokes will inspire other deaf professionals to persevere with their chosen dreams; and show how it is possible to get creative with jargon. Christopher maintains that ultimately we all want to understand the world we live in, and each other, and language shouldn't be a barrier to that.

The Lou Reed Archive mixtape

Verity Sharp shares an exclusive mixtape from the Lou Reed Archive, celebrating the work of the influential American musician, singer, songwriter, and poet. A leading figure in New York's underground music scene, most famously as leader of The Velvet Underground, Reed is celebrated for his avant-garde approach to rock as well as his lyrical storytelling and love of sonic poetry. This year he would have turned 80, and to mark it the Lou Reed Archive is releasing a previously unheard collection of demos and recordings, including the earliest known versions of some of his most famous songs.

For Late Junction, the overseers of the Lou Reed Archive Don Fleming and Jason Stern have curated a mixtape of some of these 1965 demos, as well as early recordings of Reed talking about and performing his poetry, and some of his favourite tracks from artists like Ornette Coleman and Scott Walker.

Elsewhere in the show, inspired by Lou Reed's love of storytelling through sound, Verity shares some more explorations in sonic poetry, plus a bundle of new releases.
