10.30am Building a Library: Roger Parker on Brahms' Double Concerto in A minor

The Double Concerto was Brahms' last orchestral work, composed in 1887. It was written partly as a gesture of reconciliation towards his friend the violinist, Joachim. The old friends had fallen out over Joachim's divorce. The concerto has been praised for its "vast and sweeping humour". It needs two brilliant and well matched soloists.

SAT 11:45 Music Matters (m001cgfz)
Christian Tetzlaff

Kate Molleson talks to the German violinist Christian Tetzlaff as he prepares for a recital in London. They discuss the intensity of performing live, the joy of playing chamber music, and playing one last time with his musical partner - and soul mate - Lars Vogt, who passed away recently.

Also, in light of rising living costs and of the latest Government measures, Kate is joined by critic and broadcaster Ivan Hewett, and Jamie Njoku-Goodwin, Chief Executive of UK Music, to assess how the music industry is being affected.

There's also news of a recently launched orchestra in Colombia, consisting entirely of female players, the Women's Philharmonic Orchestra.

Writer Mark Katz tells Kate about his new book 'Music and technology: a short introduction', in which he suggests music and technology have co-existed for much longer than we might think, to explain why technology can be used for good or evil, and how technology have empowered marginalised communities in societies across the world.

SAT 13:00 Inside Music (m001cgg3)

Recorder player Sarah Jeffery on music without limits

Recorder player Sarah Jeffery reveals how she arranged and recorded Steve Reich's Vermont Counterpoint for recorder and electronics, and describes how a very simple opening of a rising semitone can be enough to draw you into a piece.

Sarah also marvels at the unforgettable moment the organ dramatically cuts through the texture in Saint-Saëns's Symphony No.3, and discovers a very different type of organ in the form of 13 recorder players...

Plus, a track which combines throat singing, a driving snare drum, buzzes and creaks...

A series in which each week a musician explores a selection of music - from the inside.

SAT 15:00 Sound of Gaming (m001cgg5)
The City Getaway

Louise Blain goes on a virtual city break, sampling the soundtracks of gaming's most compelling urban landscapes. She takes in some of the cities which are centre stage in video games such as Venice in Tomb Raider 2 with a score by Nathan McCree and the terrifying plague ridden imaginary city of Yharnam in Bloodborne, beautifully brought to life by the composer Tsukasa Saitoh and others. And to hear how music enhances these gaming metropolises, Louise hears from the composing duo Joe Henson and Alexis Smith - known as The Flight - who wrote the Ivor Novello award-winning score for Assassin's Creed Odyssey, which imagines the cities of ancient Greece.

SAT 16:00 Music Planet (m001cgg7)
Traditional sounds from Haiti

Kathryn Tickell is joined by Haitian-Canadian musician Westli, whose new album 'Tradison' explores the roots music of Haiti, from vodou-inspired drumming to popular accordion songs. Plus new tracks from across the globe, including an album of Indian ragas, yoiking from Norway and a folk song from Yorkshire. The Classic Artist comes from the golden age of Ivorian music - 1980s star Ernesto Djédjé mixed the chants of the Bété people with the popular music of the period to create the Ziglibithy style.

SAT 17:00 J to Z (m001bzb8)
Azymuth in concert

Julian Joseph presents concert highlights from Brazilian jazz-funk legends Azymuth live at We Out Here festival. A key part of the golden age of jazz, soul and funk in the late 1970s and 80s, they have performed with everyone from Jorge Ben Jor to Milton Nascimento and Marcos Valle. They continue to build their legacy as one of Brazil's most charismatic and well-loved jazz groups.

Also in the programme we pay homage to four-time Grammy nominee, master organist, trumpeter and saxophonist Joey DeFrancesco who sadly died on 25 August 2022. DeFrancesco was widely celebrated for his electric live performances and for helping to revive the popularity of the Hammond organ in the late 1980s. He was beloved by many jazz enthusiasts and worked with greats such as Miles Davis, Roy Ayers, John McLaughlin and Jimmy Cobb to name a few. As well as working as a formidable sideman, he released thirty albums under his own name, most recently his 2021 album 'More Music'. Julian celebrates Joey's life as we listen back to an interview he recorded for J to Z in 2019 sharing his musical inspirations.

SAT 18:30 Opera on 3 (m001d6j0)
Salome at the Edinburgh International Festival

Swedish soprano Malin Byström takes the title role in Richard Strauss's decadent one-act thriller based on Oscar Wilde's scandalous play. Salome was first performed in Dresden in 1905 but the combination of the biblical and the erotic lead it to be banned in London by the Lord Chamberlain's office until 1907. Conductor Edward Gardner and the Bergen Philharmonic Orchestra return to the Edinburgh International Festival, following their acclaimed Peter Grimes in 2017, to paint a compelling picture of a court awash with desire and death.

SAT 20:20 New Generation Artists (m001c1c7)
Schubert's Die schöne Müllerin sung by James Newby

New Generation Artists: James Newby sings Schubert's Die schöne Müllerin.

The baritone, a recent member of Radio 3's prestigious young artist programme, gave this memorable performance of Schubert's first great song cycle at Wigmore Hall in February this year. The cycle follows the young miller's journey from cheerful optimism to despair as his girl falls for the charms of a hunter. And, as one reviewer wrote, "The young miller was there before us from the very outset...Newby was the very incarnation of the anxious young lover." Before the Schubert comes Mozart's Piano Sonata in B flat - with its touching Andante cantabile slow movement - played during lockdown by Eric Lu.

New releases come from the American electronic composer Kaitlyn Aurelia Smith and sound artist Irene Murphy, plus Nwando Ebizie explores ideas of Afrofuturism and ritual music in our ongoing series of composer think pieces, Sounding Change.

SUN 00:00 Freeness (m001cggg)
Vijay Iyer

Corey Mwamba presents the best in new improvised music, plus composer-pianist Vijay Iyer shares his musical inspirations, ahead of his debut solo show at the London Piano Festival.

Elsewhere in the programme, new music from Denmark's experimental scene by way of the group Tactical Maybe. Brimming with echolocations and pulsating starts and stops, this shapeshifting sound finds its roots in the US, Mexico, Germany and South Korea. Plus, Sarah Bernstein's Veer Quartet, featuring Sana Nagano, Leonor Falcon and Nick Joswiak creates a brooding soundworld where Baroque signatures merge with avant-garde tones.

Inevitably these are issues that find expression in the works of writers, composers and artists and have done for some time. In readings by Chloë Sommer and Ewan Bailey we find Gerard Manley Hopkins mourning the felling of some beloved poplar trees back in 1879. More recently Les Murray writes of devastating wildfires in Australia 'We have heard that the smoke from this coast was seen far out over/the curve of the earth, on the open Pacific, on islands', while in 'Bottled Macaw' Pascale Petit considers the threat of smuggling endangered species to biodiversity. There's also an extract from Rachel Carson's classic environmental work 'Silent Spring' about pesticides published in 1962. The music ranges from Luna Pearl Woolf's 'Après moi, le déluge', written in response to the catastrophic flooding caused by Hurricane Katrina, to Heitor Villa Lobos's evocation of a forest fire in the Amazon, to Marvin Gaye's 1971 elegy for the environment 'Mercy Mercy Me'. But there is room for hope too. In 'Swims' Elizabeth-Jane Burnett celebrates the literal immersion in nature offered by river-swimming and environmentalist Bill McKibben asks 'What would it mean . . . if we began to truly and viscerally think of ourselves as just one species among many?'. Music suggesting the possibility of a better future includes Re-Greening by Tansy Davies and a piece by electronic duo Orbital that was recorded in a solar-powered studio. Producer: Torquil MacLeod Readings & *Music *John Luther Adams - The Circle of Suns and Moons Les Murray - The Fire Autumn *Heitor Villa-Lobos - Floresta do Amazonas: Forest Fire *Karen Young - Ode to Nature: I. SUN 18:45 Sunday Feature (m001cgh2)
 Frank Johnson, Queen Victoria and the Black Brass Band

Uchenna Ngwe unravels the remarkable story of Francis Johnson, the most famous African American bandleader of the early 19th century, and how he wowed audiences on a British tour in the late 1830s, including - allegedly - the young Queen Victoria.

Francis "Frank" Johnson was an African American who maintained a career in the USA when slavery was still yet to be abolished, and the most celebrated Black musician before the American Civil War. He composed songs and music for social dances - cotillions and marches - and founded his own military band of Black Philadelphians in 1824.

In 1837, Johnson organised a European tour where his band wowed audiences and took England by storm. So the legend goes - Johnson was invited to Windsor Castle to meet the new Queen Victoria, where she presented Johnson with a silver bugle.

The image of Victoria meeting Johnson and his musicians is a beguiling one - and yet frustratingly tricky to pin down in hard evidence. Nearly two centuries on, the traces of this remarkable band, their pioneering tour - thought to be the first band of touring musicians from the USA - and the trail of delighted concertgoers they entertained, are scattered in archives, their fame faded away. But oboist and researcher Uchenna Ngwe has long been fascinated by Francis Johnson's story and has been slowly piecing together the fragments of his life and music that remains...

In this feature, Uchenna takes us on a musical detective hunt on the streets of Philadelphia and London: a rollercoaster musicological journey that encompasses the brand-new nation of the United States and the historic archives of the Library Company in its first capital, Philadelphia; Johann Strauss the elder, composer of the Radetzky March; the Argyll Rooms on John Nash's Regent Street; the tangled inspiration behind the idea of Promenade concerts; and the early improvisational seeds of what would decades later become jazz.

American contributors include jazz expert and native Philadelphian Brent White; historian of brass music Jay Krush; and archivists at the Library Company of Philadelphia Christine Nelson and Michael Barsanti. Meanwhile, exploring Johnson's time in the UK are historians Hakim Adi, Christina Bashford and Leanne Langley - plus we experience a remarkable discovery in the library of the Royal College of Music.

And we hear Johnson's music in a variety of guises: from historically-informed recordings by the acclaimed ensemble Chestnut Brass, to jazz arrangements by Brent White and musicians, to in-depth explorations at the piano and on the oboe from Uchenna herself and composer-pianist Yshani Perinpanayagam.

The Dunwich Dynamo

Every July on the Saturday closest to the full moon, thousands of cyclists ride overnight from central London to the Suffolk coast. It's a journey like no other: setting off in the late evening from a bustling pub in Hackney, they cycle through the night and arrive as dawn breaks on Dunwich beach - a distance of around 120 miles.

We hear the sounds of cycling as the trip unfolds, from the mesmeric ticking of a freewheel to a spectacular swoosh as a group of riders zooms past. The surroundings become increasingly rural as we get closer and closer to sunrise, allowing nocturnal wildlife and the dawn chorus to make an appearance before we arrive at Dunwich's famous shingle beach and meet the roar of the North Sea.

MON 12:00 Composer of the Week (m001cgsq)
Adolphus Hailstork (1941)

Discovering Adolphus Hailstork

American composer Adolphus Hailstork has written in many genres, ranging from orchestral and chamber, to choral, song cycles and operatic scenes. Called the Dean of African American composers, and now in his eighties, Hailstork's works have been performed by major orchestras in Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, and leading conductors have championed his music including Kurt Masur, Daniel Barenboim and Lorin Maazel.

Born in 1941, his early instrumental studies included the organ, piano, violin and the voice, but it was his experience both in the Anglican Cathedral tradition, and hearing and singing spirituals, that have had a significant impact upon the development of his own musical language. For many years he's been a Professor of Music at the Old Dominion University in Norfolk, and he resides in the state of Virginia, USA. His own list of teachers is impressive - not least Nadia Boulanger at the American Institute at Fontainebleau.

Donald Macleod explores for the first time the varied musical world of Adolphus Hailstork. In a down-the-line conversation with the composer, Hailstork discusses how he has a particular fondness for writing for choir and orchestra, and how in his early years, his mother encouraged him in music. The composer also chats about how spirituals have influenced two of his string quartets including his String Quartet No. 3, and how in the case of his Piano Sonata No. 2, he wrestled with breaking away from what he'd previously written in his first sonata. The programme ends with the final two movements of Hailstork's Symphony No. 3, and the composer reflects with Macleod on how his use of the Indian Tabla was because he'd once learnt how to play this instrument.

Blade Runner at 40

Los Angeles, November 2019 - Deyan Sudjic

Los Angeles, November 2019. Blade Runner's future is now ours. Ridley Scott's 1982 classic future film of replicants escaping to a retrofitted Earth and meeting their end at the hands of the washed out, titular Blade Runner, Harrison Ford as Rick Deckard, is adapted from Philip K Dick's equally classic 1968 novel Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep.

Both film and book are meditations on what it is to be human but we have been looking through the eyes of the film ever since it plunged us into its acid rain, neon-coated West Coast nightmare of flaming night skies, commercial ziggurats, flying cars and fake animals. Now its future is our present. We live in a world of mass species die-off, environmental crisis, rapidly developing AI, all-powerful corporations and extreme divides between rich and poor. Just that neon umbrellas never caught on and flying cars are still a luxury.

Film and book have bled into our culture in many different ways and in this series of The Essay, we mark the year of Blade Runner, in the month of Blade Runner.

Five writers explore what it is to be human or a machine, the sonic reaches of the film, the contradictions of sex robots, the cinematic legacy. And we begin with Deyan Sudjic, director of the Design Museum, considering the filmic city of Blade Runner's Los Angeles and its bleed-out beyond the screen into architecture and design.

"The film offers a deeply ambiguous spectacle. Blade Runner is a vision of a world in which mankind has blotted out the sun and nature has gone extinct. We know that we are meant to be horrified. And yet at the same time it's thrilling to look at, like taking in the view at midnight from a bar on the 60th floor of a Shanghai skyscraper, nursing a vodka martini in an iced glass."

Adolphus Hailstork (1941)

Inspired by Spirituals

Donald Macleod, in conversation with composer Adolphus Hailstork, explores his responses to Dvorak and William Grant Still.

American composer Adolphus Hailstork has written in many genres, ranging from orchestral and chamber, to choral, song cycles and operatic scenes. Called the Dean of African American composers and now in his eighties, Hailstork's works have been performed by major orchestras in Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, and leading conductors have championed his music, including Kurt Masur, Daniel Barenboim and Lorin Maazel.

Born in 1941, his early instrumental studies included the organ, piano, violin and the voice, but it was his experience both in the Anglican Cathedral tradition, and hearing and singing spirituals, that had a significant impact upon the development of his own musical language. For many years he's been a Professor of Music at the Old Dominion University in Norfolk, and His own list of teachers is impressive - not least Nadia Boulanger at the American Institute at Fontainebleau.

Donald Macleod, in conversation with the composer, explores the influence of Hailstork's African-American heritage upon his music. Hailstork discusses when he first heard spirituals, and how these works sung by those who were born, lived and died as slaves, had a huge impact upon him. The composer shares with Macleod how the music and musical direction of William Grant Still was influential upon Hailstork's own creative journey, in the bringing together of African and European traditions. Hailstork also discusses the huge impact of visiting dungeons for the slave trade in Ghana, and how this was translated into his own Symphony No. 2.

Purcell's "cold scene" aria What Pow'r Art Thou shivers besides a cinematic waltz by PJ Harvey and the welcoming chimes of Foday Musa Suso's kora. There's plenty of romantic warmth in Suk's Serenade for string orchestra and a heady arrangement of Shostakovich's Waltz for jazz band, plus the rapturous Je vais mourir from Les Troyens a Carthage by Berlioz. There's also a tinkling Rondo from Haydn's Sonata in A flat, and to open, a lustrous Love Chant by the unmistakable voices of Le Mystere Des Voix Bulgares.

Blade Runner at 40

Sounds of the Future Past - Frances Morgan

Los Angeles, November 2019. Blade Runner's future is now ours. Ridley Scott's 1982 classic future film of replicants escaping to a retro-fitted Earth and meeting their end at the hands of the washed out, titular Blade Runner, Harrison Ford as Rick Deckard, is adapted from Philip K Dick's equally classic 1968 novel Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep.

Both film and book are meditations on what it is to be human but we have been looking through the eyes of the film ever since it plunged us into its acid-rain, neon-coated, west-coast nightmare of flaming night skies, commercial ziggurats, flying cars and fake animals. Now its future is our present. We live in a world of mass species die off, environmental crisis, rapidly developing A.I., all powerful corporations and extreme divides between rich and poor.

Film and book have bled into our culture in many different ways and in this series of the Essay, we mark the year of Blade Runner, in the month of Blade Runner.

Frances Morgan, writer and researcher into electronic music, pierces the sound barrier of a film that defined the future not only in the way it looked but in the ways we heard tomorrow.

"The first thing I think of is the film's sonic environment. The main character, the Blade Runner Rick Deckard, moves through the city, from its murky streets up to its corporate penthouses, against a constant backdrop of hissing rain, distant explosions, synthesized voices from billboard-sized screens, bleeping machines, hybrid pop music, multilingual chatter and the buzz of neon. Music ebbs and flows around him: deep drones swelling into gauzy synthetic strings. His apartment pulses with a low hum. Blade Runner is suffused, saturated with sound."

Adolphus Hailstork (1941)

Inspired by European Traditions

Donald Macleod journeys into Hailstork's European musical influences, including the works of JS Bach.

American composer Adolphus Hailstork has written in many genres, ranging from orchestral and chamber, to choral, song cycles and operatic scenes. Of African American heritage and now in his eighties, Hailstork's works have been performed by major orchestras in Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, and leading conductors have championed his music, including Kurt Masur, Daniel Barenboim and Lorin Maazel.

Born in 1941, his early instrumental studies included the organ, piano, violin and the voice, but it was his experience both in the Anglican Cathedral tradition, and hearing and singing spirituals, that have had a significant impact upon the development of his own musical language. For many years he's been a Professor of Music at the Old Dominion University in Norfolk.

In conversation with the composer, Donald Macleod explores the impact of European musical traditions upon the works of Adolphus Hailstork. One of the most famous music teachers of all time was Nadia Boulanger, and Hailstork discusses the occasionally challenging experience of studying with her. The composer also talks about his love for the music of JS Bach, and how this has influenced some of his own works, including the first of his Three Spirituals for String Trio, We shall overcome, which he developed similar to a Bach chorale. Hailstork also chats with Macleod about the background to his Symphony No. 1, and how this work was premiered outside in extreme heat.

Sakari Oramo conducts Rachmaninov

Sakari Oramo conducts the BBC Symphony Orchestra in Rachmaninov's famed Piano Concerto No 2 with soloist Boris Giltburg, Prokofiev's Cinderella, and a Sophie Lacaze premiere.

The opening chords of Rachmaninov's Second Piano seem to grow out of silence: just the starting point of one of the most gripping adventures ever created for virtuoso pianist and symphony orchestra. For Cinderella. For Cinderella, meanwhile, the chimes of midnight change everything, at the brilliant climax of Prokofiev's fairy-tale ballet suite.

There's a definite aura of magic about this opening concert of the BBC Symphony Orchestra's new season. Chief Conductor Sakari Oramo is joined by Boris Giltburg – a pianist whose performances have been compared to Rachmaninov's own. WED 22:45 The Essay (m000b0mz)

Blade Runner at 40

More Human than Human - Ken Hollings

Los Angeles, November 2019. Blade Runner's future is now ours. Ridley Scott's 1982 classic future film of replicants escaping to a retro-fitted Earth and meeting their end at the hands of the washed out, titular Blade Runner, Harrison Ford as Rick Deckard, is adapted from Philip K Dick's equally classic 1968 novel Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep.

Both film and book are meditations on what it is to be human but we have been looking through the eyes of the film ever since it plunged us into its acid-rain, neon-coated, west-coast nightmare of flaming night skies, commercial ziggurats, flying cars and fake animals. Now its future is our present. We live in a world of mass species die off, environmental crisis, rapidly developing A.I., all powerful corporations and extreme divides between rich and poor.

Film and book have bled into our culture in many different ways and in this series of the Essay, we mark the year of Blade Runner, in the month of Blade Runner.

The writer Ken Hollings takes the Voight Kampff test as he examines the ethical barriers between us and the machine.

"According to both the novel and its film adaptation, androids are committing a crime simply by not being human. And in the world of 2019, Blade Runner reveals, the punishment is enforced 'retirement' – or legal execution. This is the extent to which humanity holds itself responsible for its creations."

Adolphus Hailstork (1941)

Inspired by Anglican Choral Traditions

Donald Macleod discusses with Adolphus Hailstork the origins of his interest in Jewish traditions.

American composer Adolphus Hailstork has written in many genres ranging from orchestral and chamber, to choral, song cycles and operatic scenes. Of African American heritage and now in his eighties, Hailstork's works have been performed by major orchestras in Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, and leading conductors have championed his music, including Kurt Masur, Daniel Barenboim and Lorin Maazel. Born in 1941, his early instrumental studies included the organ, piano, violin and the voice, but it was his experience both in the Anglican Cathedral tradition, and hearing and singing spirituals, that have had a significant impact upon the development of his own musical language. For many years he's been a Professor of Music at the Old Dominion University in Norfolk, and he resides in the state of Virginia, USA. His own list of teachers is impressive, not least of all Nadia Boulanger at the American Institute at Fontainebleau. Hailstork's own reputation has been significant, and he's been called the Dean of African-American composers.

Adolphus Hailstork from an early stage not only sang in an Anglican Cathedral, but also played the organ and went on to conduct choirs too. The composer in conversation with Donald Macleod, delves into how important these early experiences were upon how his own musical language has developed. Hailstork mentions how the first movement of his Piano Concerto has been commented upon as similar to Gregorian Chant, and how the grandeur of Cathedral music can be clearly heard in many of his own writings of choir and orchestra. Macleod also explores with the composer how other traditions have influenced him, including finding the Jewish song Shalom Chaverim and creating a set of piano variations from it.

How We Read

The word 'reading' may appear to describe something specific and universal, but in reality it's more of an umbrella term, covering a huge range of ways in which people interact with text. Dyslexia and hyperlexia may be two of the more obvious departures from normative ideas of reading, but whether we're neurodivergent or not we all read in different ways that can vary significantly depending on what we're reading and why we're reading it. Matthew Sweet is joined by Matt Rubery, Louise Creechan and poets Debris Stevenson and Anthony Anaxagorou.

Matt Rubery, Professor of Modern Literature at Queen Mary, University of London has worked on books including The Untold Story of the Talking Book; Audiobooks, Literature, and Sound Studies, Further Reading and Reader's Block: A History of Reading Differences. Dr Beth Singler, Junior Research Fellow in Artificial Intelligence at Homerton College, Cambridge asks what is real and fake in A.I. sex and love.

"Simulation forces us to think about how we can the 'real' that we seem so often to be confident about. Confident enough perhaps to reassure ourselves that the use of 'fake' humans as slave labour and sexbots is alright to be skimmed over in the dialogue of the human characters in Blade Runner. What does it say about the society in the world of Blade Runner that it is okay with slave replicants who fight our off-world wars and fulfil sexual needs for colonists? It gets worse. What does it say about a society that is okay with slave replicants who are only two years old?"

Harvest

How might we reimagine harvest traditions for the 21st century? Joining Ian to examine the language of harvest, past, present and future are Rebecca May Johnson, author of 'Small Fires: An Epic in the Kitchen'. In this playful memoir, she rewrites the kitchen as a vital source of knowledge and revelation. A novelist and nature writer, everything Melissa Harrison writes is attuned to the seasons. For Melissa, autumn is a particularly poignant time of year when life and death rub up against each other.

Amy Jeffs explores the stories and myths that make up Britain in her books 'Wild: Tales from Early Medieval Britain' and 'Storyland', here she explains how harvest traditions have fed into our folk tales.

And our 'Something New' poem, part of our series celebrating 100 years of the relationship between the BBC and poetry, comes this week from Joelle Taylor.

Blade Runner at 40

Fiery the Angels Fell - David Thomson

Los Angeles, November 2019. Blade Runner's future is now ours. Ridley Scott's 1982 classic future film of replicants escaping to a retrofitted Earth and meeting their end at the hands of the washed out, titular Blade Runner, Harrison Ford as Rick Deckard, is adapted from Philip K. Dick's equally classic 1968 novel Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep.

Both film and book are meditations on what it is to be human but we have been looking through the eyes of the film ever since it plunged us into its acid-rain, neon-coated, west-coast nightmare of flaming night skies, commercial ziggurats, flying cars and fake animals. Now its future is our present. We live in a world of mass species die off, environmental crisis, rapidly developing A.I., all powerful corporations and extreme divides between rich and poor.

Film and book have bled into our culture in many different ways and in this series of the Essay, we mark the year of Blade Runner, in the month of Blade Runner. The legendary writer on film, David Thomson, takes a long hard look back at Ridley Scott's rain-soaked mash-up of existential noir and artificial souls.

"Maybe you've never seen Blade Runner – but you think you have. It's one of those films in our dreams and feeble memory. I used to think it was what it claimed to be, the story of a sour bounty hunter charged to eliminate or retire some dangerous escapees from the old scheme of how the universe was run."

Everybody clap your hands

Pat-a-cake, pat-a-cake, baker's man. Ringing out across school playgrounds for decades, this nursery rhyme has been accompanied by the sound of many peoples first musical instrument, the clapping of hands! Jennifer Lucy Allan delves into this world of body percussion with a traditional chant from the Selk'nam people of Patagonia, music from Tuareg musician Idassane Wallet Mohamed and minimalist composer Steve Reich's 1972 piece Clapping Music, written for two performers and performed entirely by clapping.
